Mōrena,

I just wanted to link to this in case it comes up anywhere - I understand Puawai is co-chair of Te Ara Tahī GG.

Mōrena Joanne,

Thanks for sharing that. Let me have an in-confidence chat with a couple of colleagues and plan how to approach.

I'll also schedule some time in for a decent catch up for the two of us. Is the beginning of next week too late?

Ngā mihi

Welcome back!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Just for you to be aware of here's a screenshot from yesterday's linked in where Stephen has attracted some pretty heavy criticism from Puawai Cairns, who is of course co-chair of Te Ara Tahi governance board as you know. No doubt we need to consider the potential impact of this, what if anything we can do in terms of the damage done - and consider how/if we could avoid this sort of thing happening again (maybe seeking advice from SMEs).

Also I'd like to have a non-urgent chat with you when you get your head above water.

Tēnā koe Joanne

I have read the post on LinkedIn and understand why he wrote it in relation to unbunking the concept of 'data sovereignty' vs 'residency'. I don't believe he was portraying a viewpoint as CA. I'm sure his response to Puawai was quite clear and he is highlighting that this work is ongoing to find solutions.

Kia ora Anahera, I'm wondering what your thoughts are on this Linked In exchange yesterday?

providers!) then what?

I think we might agree that the choice of provider, the terms of service, and whether we believe the provider is sticking to those terms are really important considerations.

They are, but they are a means to an end, which is ultimately access control. Changing ownership of data is a disposal action under the Public Records Act, so any third party taking control of the data is a disposal for government data and information (sale, discharge, transfer, etc. are all disposal actions). So, really the point about access and disposal control is still the primary objective.

Lol. And you look after Māori archives as a profession? In your view what Māori say they want is not what Māori want? What an arrogant statement. Controversial yes, arrogant also yes.

Interesting read! From memory when researching this topic 3+ years ago multiple countries do have high assurance private government clouds 'G-Cloud' style using capable partners with the access control models you describe combined with administrative controls over ownership structures, data flows and non sovereign intrusion defined. Singapore, France, Germany, Saudi Arabia all spring to mind as examples. Tends to require deep pockets

I've removed the post, my intent was an interesting discussion not to cause consternation. As it's clearly overstepped that line it's not serving its original purpose. It was within Govt policy and archives own guidance, but I'd certainly not want to upset anyone or cause a negative response deliberately.

Ok. Thanks for letting me know. Happy to have a conversation once you're ready about how to best support you with this engagement approach in future.

I had run the content past Anahera and other Māori data specialists too, from a Māori perspective, so I'm surprised it got such a reaction (I was just stating the obvious, and generally accepted stuff in the industry) my posts are generally uncontentious, I've never really been in this position before. So I'll just stay away from this topic in future.

Kia ora – below is the relevant extract from handover notes provided to the DCE on his return from overseas on 2 August.

Today's conversation was about a Linked In post [Stephen] made on data sovereignty and the resulting commentary. I can update you separately on that, however after a conversation with him, Stephen made the choice to take the post down. CE's office is aware, and there is a broader context as well, of course. I've offered a follow up conversation with Stephen to discuss what support he might need in future for this engagement approach.
